WHERE THE PRINTS COME FROM

I grew up between Bali, Bangladesh, Thailand, Singapore and Pakistan. As an adult I have lived in Tokyo, New York, Berlin, Tulum and Australia.

The prints come from the first list. Resist is a dyeing term. Batik — Java, the island next door. Washi is Japanese paper, reproduced at full cloth width. Rare Moth is shibori, resist-dyed. The mark on every garment is a silkworm moth, and the cloth is silk. These are the textile traditions of the places I was a child in, and I did not choose them so much as recognise them later.

What comes from the second list is the way they are drawn. Scale, contrast, a single motif big enough to read across a dark room. That is print culture and music culture rather than craft, and it is why these are not quiet prints.

The cloth holds both.

Prints designed by Oli Chang.

THE CLOTH

Silk chiffon and silk cotton, 140 cm wide. Seven prints, printed dye-through and set at full fabric width, so a single motif can run the whole of a front panel. Two cloths carry no motif at all: Cream Washi, an ancient-paper texture in a neutral blended from the cream and off-white tones of the others, and its opposite in Black Washi.

Silk became the most traded cloth in the world because it carries a great deal of value in almost no weight.

I spent a long time on the Silk Road through northern Pakistan, up the Karakoram Highway towards the Chinese border. The road is there because cloth was worth carrying over a 4,700 m pass — value with no weight, which is the whole argument. Same reason, different century.

The honest reason the cloth is light is that everything else I travel with is heavy. I have spent my life moving music equipment around the world — lately handmade electric pianos — and the equipment is not negotiable. It weighs what it weighs. So the clothes had to give.

There are two kinds of trip. On the big shows the gear fills the hold, and the clothes have to disappear into whatever is left. On a DJ run there is no gear at all — if I am in Bali and there is a show in China on Friday, I go with a carry-on and nothing else: two weeks, ten changes, nothing in the hold and nothing to lose at the other end.

Both ends of that want the same thing from a shirt.

ONLY COMES ROUND AGAIN AFTER A METRE OR MORE

The artwork is a magnified passage of something much larger, and it only returns after a metre or more of cloth — an unusually long interval, not a conventional repeat. So every panel the cutter takes lands somewhere different in the drawing. One shirt gets a motif whole; the next gets the same motif cut by the shoulder seam; a third gets the ground between them. Collars, cuffs and pockets come from wherever the cloth allowed.

The dyeing adds its own variation, and the sewing is done a piece at a time. No two pieces are exactly alike. The small irregularities are the making showing through.

MADE IN BALI

Every garment is cut and sewn in Bali by Indonesian cottage industries — small family workshops, working piece by piece out of their own homes and compounds rather than on a factory line.

The making happens here, by people who live here. All dyes are OEKO-TEX approved: no harmful chemicals in the cloth, in the water, or on the hands that make it.

Pieces are also made to order for musicians and performers. A touring week is a festival, a nightclub, a restaurant, a wedding and a beach, carried in hand luggage — the same problem this cloth was solving a thousand years ago.

FOUR GARMENTS

The shirt is an oversized unisex short-sleeve button-up, cut to hang loose and worn by all genders.

The Serpent short takes its shape from the Muay Thai ring — high-cut, wide through the leg, wide shirred waistband. The printed panels run down the front; the back is one plain black panel. It comes in every print, including Black Washi for an all-black set. One elasticated size fits a waist from 68 to 104 cm, and an internal drawstring draws it down for smaller frames.

The bomber is reversible — Snakes in the Rain on one face, Black Washi on the other, a silkworm moth across the back and a bloom on each chest. A reversible silk souvenir jacket is a sukajan, which puts it in the same lineage as the shibori and the washi: a form the brand already had a claim on rather than a shape borrowed.

This is a summer collection, and the bomber is the piece that takes it onto a plane. Silk, so it packs to nothing — for a cold cabin, and for the hour of a European summer night when it finally turns.

The sarong is a single 183 × 112 cm rectangle, printed so the artwork stands upright once it is wrapped.
